A former Afghan military interpreter has been granted asylum – in a major victory for a Daily Mail campaign.

The 31-year-old, who worked with UK and other coalition forces on the front line against the Taliban for seven years, was this week told he could stay.

Only last April, immigration officials attempted to put him on a plane to Afghanistan.

Last night Lewis Kett, a lawyer from Duncan Lewis Solicitors, said the Home Office is reviewing its controversial policy of returning Afghan military interpreters to their home country.

The successful case will raise hopes that others in the UK will be granted sanctuary.

Currently officials say interpreters can be sent back to 'safe' areas such as Kabul –despite attempts by the Taliban to assassinate those who worked for the coalition.

Last summer a ban was placed on all forced returns to Afghanistan but the Court of Appeal overturned it. Nearly 180,000 people have backed the Mail's campaign – Betrayal of the Brave – to grant Afghan interpreters asylum in Britain.

The man involved in the case is not being named. He said he and his family received numerous written and telephone threats from the Taliban.

When allied forces began to leave Afghanistan in 2014 he fled to the UK to claim asylum, arriving in December that year. He was detained and his claim was refused, before officials tried to put him on a chartered return flight in April last year.

'I was given a ticket for that flight by the Home Office and was absolutely terrified,' he told the Guardian.

He was saved by a last-minute court hearing. 'I am so happy about this decision,' he added. 'The work I did for the allied forces was very dangerous. I saw so many dead bodies and what I saw has deeply affected me.'

'My life was at risk ... the Taliban would target me if the UK had sent me back to Afghanistan. I hope that my case will help other interpreters who are in the same situation I was in.'

When allied forces began to leave Afghanistan in 2014, the interpreter fled to claim asylum (file picture)

Fresh evidence presented in the man's case set out the dangers to interpreters even in the Afghan capital.

Mr Kett told the Guardian: 'These interpreters put their lives on the line to assist British, American and other Western forces in their efforts to stabilise the country and our evidence clearly suggests they are now being tracked down, and tortured or killed.'

'Their role has a particularly symbolic value to the Taliban, given they acted essentially as the face and voice for Western forces, and marked them out in the eyes of the Taliban as traitors to their country and as a priority target.'

He added: 'At the court hearing in January, a Home Office official explained that the policy team had been considering their position in general on Afghan interpreters... they wanted to review their policy... in light of the substantial body of new evidence we had provided to them.'

Senior military figures and politicians have backed the Mail's campaign.

Ten interpreters facing death threats from the Taliban are on their way to Britain after desperately fleeing Afghanistan and paying people smugglers, At least another five are believed to be stuck at Calais trying to get to the UK.

The Home Office did not respond to requests for comment last night. It has said that all asylum claims are considered 'on their own merits'.

 At last the government have come to their senses. My son worked closely with these men in Afghanistan and their help to our troops was invaluable. No matter what the rights and wrongs of the Afghan Campaign, the interpreters put their own and their families lives on the line.

 If the majority of our servicemen who worked with them found their services invaluable and risk-reducing, that's more than good enough for me. If Britain had chosen to stab such people in the back, who in their right mind is going to offer their services to our personnel in some future conflict elsewhere, and perhaps save lives by ensuring hostility isn't caused by a lack of communication and local dialect.

 Please remind us why all those Brits died in Afghanistan? Now the government seems to think it's more dangerous than when we were there.
